The world is divided into two main groups of countries: the developed countries of the North and the developing countries of the South. The Brandt Line is a dashed line that separates the two groups. It is named after Willy Brandt, a German politician who was the first to propose the line. The line is not a straight line, but it follows the general shape of the world's landmasses. It separates the rich, industrialized countries of the North from the poor, developing countries of the South. The line is a symbol of the global divide between the rich and the poor.
