Abstract

Abstract—The purpose of this study was to determine if there were differences in the prevalence of musculoskeletal disorders among different types of workers. The subjects included all employees of a large manufacturing company who had been employed for at least one year. A questionnaire was sent to each employee asking about symptoms of musculoskeletal disorders and work-related factors. The results showed that the prevalence of musculoskeletal disorders was higher among non-manual workers than manual workers. This finding suggests that non-manual workers may be more vulnerable to musculoskeletal disorders than manual workers.

The study's authors also studied (significant) differences in the use of information communication technology (ICT) among the groups. The researchers found that the use of ICT was significantly higher in the 18-24 age group than in the other age groups. This suggests that the younger generation is more likely to use ICT for their information needs.

Abstract: The authors assess whether, as predicted, 14-month-old children with autism spectrum disorder (ASD) have a reduced ability to understand the relationship between the location of an object and the location of the person who is looking at it. In Experiment 1, 14-month-old children with ASD were shown a video of a person looking at an object and then were asked to point to the object. Children with ASD were less likely to point to the object than children with typical development. In Experiment 2, 14-month-old children with ASD were shown a video of a person looking at an object and then were asked to point to the person. Children with ASD were more likely to point to the person than children with typical development. The results suggest that children with ASD have a reduced ability to understand the relationship between the location of an object and the location of the person who is looking at it.
