

Sociology Essay Example: Major Theoretical Perspectives in Sociology Essay

Sociology mostly utilizes theories when explaining a particular phenomenon in the social world. These perceptive give diverging and converging ways of seeing the social world in which human lives (Mooney et al., 64). They thus have some similarities and differences which make them unique from each other. This paper thus aims at comparing and contrasting some theoretical perspectives in sociology which will include functionalism, conflict theory, interactionism, queer theory, and feminism.

Functionalist perspective in sociology

Functionalism perspective in sociology perceives the entire society divided into different functional groups. These groups include families, politics, education system, and religion among others. Functionalism suggests that they all interact with one another in a harmonious way so that to develop the norm in the society (Campos, 3). For example, families give rise to new members, nature them, and also socialize them. Religion, on the other hand, place moral to the society, create a spiritual culture, and advance level of interaction, while as politics set the rules, and implement them to ensure there is equality in society. When all these functions work together, then such perspective is the one referred as functionalism.

Conflict theory in sociology

The conflict theory looks the society from as opposite direction of factionalism. This theory suggests that all the functional units in the community are always in competition and thus are characterized by conflict. For example, there is a conflict between genders due to the different roles constructed by the society which diminishes women (MacDonald, 14). Another example is from the employees and employers where they are in constant conflict about income and profits. The theory thus suggests that coexistence occurs once equilibrium is achieved. Conflict theory differs widely with functionalism theory as it perceives conflict where functionalism sees harmony in the society.

Interactionism in sociology

Interactionism is a much different concept as oppose to functionalism and conflict theory. Both these theories focus on the broader view of the social characteristics. However, concerning interactionism, it concentrates on the small segment of the society. It states that each small group of a community behavior in a unique manner as each human is a social actor on him/herself (Rock, 78). Their actions are thus influenced by other individuals, and thus there cannot be a universal way of explaining their behaviors and social problems.

Queer theory in sociology

This approach concentrates on the common definitions which are at odds with standard or desired social view. In particular, its focuses on mismatches between sexes, gender, and desire. For example, concerning sex and sex orientation, queer theory suggest that it is wrong to only thing
