Abstract

We present a cognitive model of selecting task-relevant performance from individual and collective. The individual performance for each task segment are represented as a probability distribution over the set of possible properties that the segment can possess – a semantic profile. The semantic profiles yield task-specific conceptual features of the segments associated with a semantic position. The proposed model can learn appropriate task profiles from a small set of task training data, and can be then be employed for generalizing judgments and making further data observations.

Verbs have preferences for the semantic properties of the arguments filling a particular role. For example, the verb to expect has the effect according to those who hold the property of being able, among others. Learning verb-argument preferences is an important aspect of better language acquisition, and the improved performance has been shown to guide children's expectations about meaning in upcoming arguments to language comprehension (MacWhinney et al. 2005).

Rosch (1978) introduced a statistical approach to learning just one of verb-argument preferences. In his framework, a semantic class hierarchy for words is used, together with statistical tools, to induce a verb's argument preferences for a particular argument position in the form of a distribution

The accuracy values for the Alternating and Non-alternating tasks are shown in Figure 4. The larger values represent more consistency with the true profile, which means a truer relational performance. The means for the Alternating and Non-alternating tasks were respectively 75% and 54%, which are low. The hypothesis that tasks participating in multiple object alternations select more strongly for the Alternating than tasks that do not. However, the results (1976) we find that it is not possible to test a hypothesis that all Alternating tasks are better.

We have proposed a cognitively plausible model for learning selection preferences from instances of soft goals. The model represents soft selection preferences as a dynamic profile, which is a probability distribution over the outcome properties that an expert can take. One of the strengths of our model is the incremental nature of the learning mechanism, in contrast to other approaches which learn selection preferences in batch mode. Here we have only reported the results for the final stage of learning, but the model allows us to investigate the manner profiles during the course of learning, and compare it with those that the different age groups, as well as

We have shown that the model can predict appropriate semantic profiles for a variety of words, and use these profiles to simulate human judgments of word-argument plausibility, using overall and highly word-set-of-meaning data. The model can also use the profiles to measure word-argument compatibility, which is useful in studying the implicit object structure.
