

Basic Principles of Flight

The Third Law of Motion

Heavier-than-air flight can be explained by various scientific laws and theorems. Of these, Newton's Third Law of Motion is possibly the fundamental one. "For every action there is an equal and opposite reaction." A propeller accelerates a mass of air backward, and thereby receives an equal forward force. This forward force, called thrust, pulls the aircraft ahead.

As the aircraft is thrust forward by the propeller on take-off, the wing meeting the oncoming air begins to generate lift (Fig. 1-1). As the forward speed of the aircraft increases, this lift force increases proportionately. When the lift force is equal to the weight of the aircraft, the aircraft begins to fly.

The Atmosphere

An aircraft operates in a world that is very near the earth, yet has vastly different properties. This world is the atmosphere, composed of air, which surrounds the earth. We must know something about this atmosphere to understand flight.

Density and Pressure

One property of air that is apt to mislead the novice student of flight is density. Ask the weight of the air in an ordinary room and answers will vary from "almost nothing," to "about 10 pounds." Yet the answer is close to 300 pounds and in a large hall may be over a ton! Raise that half a mile above the earth, though, and the air in it will weigh far less. Its density — its mass per unit volume — has changed. These changes in density are measured as air pressure.

It is true, of course, that the density of air is low compared with that of water, yet it is this property of air that makes flight possible. Air being the medium in which flight occurs, as its properties change the characteristics of a particular flight will change.

The average pressure at sea level due to the weight of the atmosphere is 14.7 pounds per square inch, a pressure that causes the mercury in a barometer to rise 29.92 inches. In a standard situation the pressure drops from 14.7 pounds per square inch at sea level to 10.2 pounds per square inch at 10,000 feet.

Temperature Changes (Lapse Rate)

With an increase in height there is a decrease in air temperature. The reason is that the sun's heat passes through the atmosphere without appreciably raising the temperature. The earth, however, absorbs the heat. The temperature of the earth is raised and the air in contact with it absorbs some of the heat.

The Four Forces

An aircraft in flight is under the influence of four main forces: lift, weight, thrust, and drag (Fig. 1-2).
