

If we are to report the results of a measurement as numbers, then either we can produce the measurements, a standard, using the definition, or we can use something if a value from another place can be said to be about a length of 1 “light-year.” If we do not have the meaning of the unit light-year, then the other hand, it becomes hard to write our units of measurement reports that a wall is 2 meters high, and our unit of length is defined to be 2 meters, we know that the length of the wall is twice our basic length unit. Otherwise, if we are told that a person has a mass of 70 kilograms, and our unit of mass is defined to be 1 kilogram, then that person is 70 times as massive as our basic unit.¹ Whatever is chosen as a standard must be made as accurate and precise as possible, and can be measured reliably—measurements taken by different people in different places must yield the same result.

In 1983, an international committee established a set of standards for length, mass, and other basic quantities. The system established is an abbreviation of the metric system, and is called the SI system of units. (The abbreviation SI comes from the system’s French name “Système International.”) In this system, the unit of length, mass, and time are the meter, kilogram, and second, respectively. Other SI standards established by the committee are those for temperature (the kelvin), electric current (the ampere), luminous intensity (the candela), and the amount of substance (the mole). In our study of mechanics we shall be concerned only with the units of length, mass, and time.

Length

In 1793, the king of England decreed that the standard of length in his country would be based on the yard and would be precisely equal to the distance from the tip of his nose to the end of his outstretched arm. Naturally, the original standard for the foot adopted by the French was the length of the foot from the knee to the hip. This standard prevailed until 1790, when the legal standard of length in France became the meter defined as one ten-millionth the distance from the equator to the North Pole along one particular longitudinal line that passes through Paris.

Many other systems for measuring length have been developed over the years, but the advantages of the French system have caused it to prevail in almost all countries and in scientific circles worldwide. As accurate as 1983, the length of the meter was defined as the distance between two lines on a specific platinum-iridium bar stored under controlled conditions in France. This standard was then chosen for several reasons, a principal one being that the fastest accuracy with which the separation between the lines on the bar can be determined does not even the various requirements of science and technology. In the 1960s and 1970s, the meter was defined as 1 650 763.73 wavelengths of orange-red light emitted from a krypton-86 lamp. Moreover, in October 1983, the meter (m) was redefined as the distance traveled by light in vacuum during a time of $1/299\,792\,458$ second. In effect, this latest definition establishes that the speed of light in vacuum is precisely $299\,792\,458$ m per second.

Table 2.1 lists approximate values of some measured lengths.

¹ The word for carrying numerical values to indicate measured physical quantities was suggested by Simon Stevin (1580–1649), a French mathematician. “In effect, as these values are not derived either from any existing theory, theory, and require to be established, one should have something other to their origin, one cannot rely on a number, one knowledge is of a longer and more diverse kind. It was for the beginning of knowledge that one has already to use thought, abstracted to the state of science.”
