Since all these hypotheses are theory, subalternity is generalizable. Since it is a common-sense generalization, it is not particular about individuals and communities; the one gets the qualities of generalizing that come from a particular study (not a particular, singular, individual about whom he has written). This statement goes all the way to the heart of the matter: that it is not the individual, singular, particular that is the subject of the study. This goes all the way to the heart of the matter: that it is not the individual, singular, particular that is the subject of the study. This goes all the way to the heart of the matter: that it is not the individual, singular, particular that is the subject of the study.
