Market: Open-end mutual funds are companies that manage a portfolio of investments for investors. They operate much like public corporations, with shareholders who elect a board of directors to oversee the company's operations. The board of directors is responsible for selecting and overseeing the fund's investment manager, who makes the day-to-day investment decisions. The fund's performance is measured relative to a benchmark index, and the fund's assets are valued daily. The fund's net asset value (NAV) is the price of one share of the fund, and it is calculated by dividing the fund's total assets by the number of shares outstanding.
