

EXHIBIT 1Business Stakeholders

Business Stakeholder	Interest in the Business	Examples
Capital market stakeholders	Providers of major financing for the business	Banks and owners
Product or service market stakeholders	Buyers of products or services and vendors to the business	Customers and suppliers
Government stakeholders	Collect taxes and fees from the business and its employees	Federal, state, and local governments
Internal stakeholders	Individuals employed by the business	Employees and managers

Stakeholders

Most colleges and universities publish a Student Code of Conduct that sets forth the ethical conduct expected of students.

The companies listed in Exhibit 2 were caught in the midst of ethical lapses that led to fines, firings, and criminal and/or civil prosecution. The second column of Exhibit 2 identifies the nature of scandal. The third column of the table identifies some of the results of these events. In most cases, senior and mid-level executives lost their jobs and were sued by upset investors. In some cases, the executives were also criminally prosecuted and are serving prison terms.

What went wrong for these companies and executives? The answer to this question involves the following three factors:

1. Individual character
2. Firm culture
3. Laws and enforcement

Individual Character An ethical businessperson displays character by embracing honesty, integrity, and fairness in the face of pressure to hide the truth. Executives often face pressures from senior managers to meet company and analysts' expectations. In many of the cases in Exhibit 2, executives initially justified small violations to avoid such pressures. However, these small lies became big lies as the company's financial problems became worse. By the time the abuses were discovered, the misstatements became sufficient to ruin businesses and wreck lives. For example, David Myers, the former controller
