

The outgoing Receiver tells Jonas to call him "the Giver." He teaches Jonas about his new role and transmits memories to Jonas by placing his hands on the boy's back. When the Giver transmits a memory to Jonas, it leaves him forever. Jonas receives pleasant memories about sunshine, sliding, and rainbows, as well as troubling ones about war, neglect, and pain. One of the most pleasant and meaningful memories involves a holiday scene with children and their loving grandparents. When Jonas receives memories, part of him travels to the time and place the memory was made, and he relives the experience. By experiencing things his community has ingested away—such as love, hunger, pain, and excitement—he sees that the life he is living lacks richness and meaning. He begins to think about his learning and experiencing with the people he cares about, but he is not allowed to talk to anyone about his learning to anyone but the Giver. As Receiver, he is supposed to be the objective who records the day with anyone a question and be if he must, but he's forbidden from sharing the details of his life. The other people in the community wouldn't understand what they do not understand: pain, intense feelings, or collective memories, so Jonas and the Giver do.

As Jonas's training progresses, he feels increasingly alienated from his family and friends. They only experience mild emotions, and they continue to value the order, control, and predictability that keep the community from rioting. Meanwhile, Jonas feels different from everyone else and begins to question some of the community's values. He starts to see the value in making choices for oneself, even when risk is involved, and why one might want to pay attention to differences. He starts thinking about the meaning of freedom and pondering what life might be like outside the Community. He learns what love is, but his family members won't comprehend the concept. Jonas gives his love to those who seem to need and understand it the most: the Giver and his boy Gabriel. He keeps Gabriel close to himself, Jonas transmits calming memories to the boy each night. Jonas knows this is against the rules, but he doesn't want Gabriel to be released.

The Giver becomes like a grandfather to Jonas. In addition to providing guidance, he loves and cares about the future Receiver. The Giver helps Jonas deal with the pain and sadness he's experiencing through difficult memories and the soothing nature of the Receiver role. He also shares wisdom from his life, including a heartbreaking situation from 12 years earlier. The community leaders selected a girl named Rosemary to become the new Receiver. Rosemary happened to be the Giver's daughter. Partway through the training, after she started receiving hard-erasing memories, she applied for release. The Giver never sees her again, but he did see a recording of her release. He learned that release is not simply sending someone to Elsewhere, so he had to tell her. Release involves a lethal injection, and Rosemary believed her own. The Giver believes he failed his daughter, himself, and the community. After Rosemary's death, the memories she stored came flooding back to the rest of the community, whose members were not equipped to deal with them. Because of this incident, Receivers can no longer apply for release.

When Jonas tells the Giver that he wants to see his father prepare a boy for release, he gets more than he bargained for. The recording shows that Jonas's father did not do the things he claimed he would do to help the boy, such as making him clean and cooperative. Jonas watches his father administer the
