

The article written by Alok Jha concentrates on the journey of a water molecule from its coming from asteroids to the moment of which this article is printed. The author excels at informing the reader with the use of tone, language and discourse.

Initially, the author benefits from a humorous tone to clarify the academic content of the article. To exemplify, the title of the article "Once your blood was a dinosaur pee" attracts the reader within the first moment since the usage of mocking tone prevents the reader from being strangled with the scientific information grasped in the article. The authorial choices of tone shifts seen through the paper, such as "a water molecule" to a possessive pronoun "our molecule", further engages the reader to the journey of the water molecule and creates a sense of sincerity. This feeling of sincerity established between the reader and the molecule is further supported with the end of the article when the reader finds out that the water molecule is on the paper sitting motionless. In addition to these, the author also utilizes energetic tone to satisfy the reader with the rapid flow of events which maintains the sets up the feeling of a journey. Emphasizing the quick transformations of the water molecule, the quote "...our molecule finds its way into a whale's brain, an Antarctic ice sheet, a glass of water and a human heart. Later, it waters a pine tree..." illustrates the author's usage of dynamic and energetic tone.

Secondly, the author supports his usage of humorous and energetic tone with his use of colloquial and descriptive language in order to wreck the challenging mood originated from the academic content in the paper. As an illustration, in the quote, "In concert with other water molecules, it forces DNA, proteins and cell membranes into the correct shapes to function," it can be seen that the author explains the ability of water molecules to shape complex DNA structures transparently with the assistance of colloquial words, such as "force" and "correct shapes". By not going into scientific details, the author highlights the fact that the aim of the article is narrating the journey of a water molecule with a bird's eye view regarding its historical milestones rather than analyzing every step that water molecule took in a scientific manner.

Finally, the authorial choices made in the paragraph extends the scope of the intended audience which are educated people that are interested in science and history with the ages ranging 16-65. Targeting a broad audience, the author purposes a moment for the reader to be intrigued not only from the historical events that the water molecule underwent trough but also from the scientific process that brought it to the point where the water molecule becomes the ink which this article was written with.

Overall, the author's use of tone, language and intended audience provides the reader with a clarified explanation of historical and scientific events that a water molecule underwent. The humorous and dynamic style of the author makes the reader engage in the narrative, whereas the colloquial language of the article makes the scientific content of the article comprehensible. All in all, the author accomplishes to inform the reader with the successive use of humorous and dynamic tone, figurative and colloquial language, and discourse.
