Abstract The purpose of a cross-sectional study, implemented in 2004, was to assess the prevalence of the use of the Internet for health information among adults in the United States. The study was conducted using data from the National Health and Medical Care Survey. The results showed that the prevalence of the use of the Internet for health information was 15.1% among adults in the United States. The prevalence of the use of the Internet for health information was significantly higher among adults who were female, had a higher education level, and had a higher income level. The prevalence of the use of the Internet for health information was significantly lower among adults who were older, had a lower education level, and had a lower income level. The results of this study suggest that the use of the Internet for health information is increasing among adults in the United States, and that the use of the Internet for health information is more prevalent among adults who are female, have a higher education level, and have a higher income level.
