

3-12. The accessory case conforms to the shape of the crankcase rear flange and is open at its front side within the height of the crankcase. The accessory case extends below the crankcase, forming a closed compartment which serves as the oil sump in dry sump models.

3-13. The rear surface of the accessory case is provided with raised, machined pads for mounting of the starter, generator, magnetos, left and right side accessory drive adapters, oil screen housing, tachometer drive housing, and accessory drive idler gear shaft. Tapped holes and studs provide attachments for adapters, housings and accessories. The upper center pad of E-185-8, -9, -11 and E-225-4, -8 accessory cases has five studs set into its machined face to accommodate the Eclipse starter and its adapter. The accessory cases of the earliest E Series engines had three studs set in this location on which the Delco-Remy starter was mounted.

3-14. The accessory case casting is provided with an external boss near the top of the left side. For use with wet sump engines, this boss is bored, and an oil filler neck is installed. For dry sump engines a hole is tapped through the boss for a vent connection to the oil tank.

3-15. The pressure oil screen assembly is screwed into a housing which is attached by five hex head screws to the rear surface of the accessory case below the right magneto. The open front end of the tubular screen assembly fits closely into a counterbore in cases of wet sump engines, while cases of dry sump models are equipped with a check valve assembly which fits in the same counterbore and receives a slightly different screen over its rear shoulder. The check valve offers no resistance to oil leaving the front end of the screen, but it prevents return flow during periods of idleness. The cavity surrounding the oil screen is connected by a passage to the pressure oil pump outlet port. The pressure oil screen exit cavity of cases for wet sump engines is drilled and tapped through from the right side of the case for an outlet oil line elbow fitting. No such outlet is machined in cases for dry sump engines. In these castings the screen exit is connected to the rear end of the crankcase right oil gallery.

3-16. The gear type pressure oil pump housing is attached to the front surface of the accessory case rear wall by five screws. One screw is installed from the rear and lies within the generator pilot counterbore of the case rear surface. Two of the pressure oil screen housing attaching screws pass through the case rear wall and into pump housing tapped holes. The other two points of pump housing attachment are the two tachometer drive housing attaching screws. The lower, or driving, impeller of the pres-
