Methodology

The study was conducted using a mixed-methods approach, combining quantitative data analysis with qualitative interviews. The quantitative data was collected from a survey of 100 participants, while the qualitative data was collected from 10 semi-structured interviews.

The survey was designed to measure the frequency and duration of various activities, while the interviews were designed to explore the reasons for these activities and the impact on the participants' lives.

The data was analyzed using statistical software for the quantitative data and thematic analysis for the qualitative data. The results of the study are presented in the following sections.

The first section of the results presents the frequency and duration of the activities, while the second section presents the reasons for these activities and the impact on the participants' lives.

The third section presents the impact of the activities on the participants' lives, while the fourth section presents the conclusions of the study.

The study found that the frequency and duration of the activities were significantly higher for the participants in the intervention group compared to the control group.

The reasons for these activities were primarily related to the participants' desire to improve their physical health and mental well-being.

The impact of the activities on the participants' lives was positive, with participants reporting improved physical health, mental well-being, and overall quality of life.

The study concludes that the intervention was effective in increasing the frequency and duration of the activities, and that the participants' reasons for these activities were primarily related to their desire to improve their physical health and mental well-being.
