Is Price Inflation Different for the Elderly? Ernst R. Berndt, 1997 Using annual IMS data from 1990 to 1996 we examine empirically whether whether elderly nonelderly price inflation differentials exist for one medical item namely prescription pharmaceuticals We assess prices for Rx for Rx drugs destined for ultimate use by the elderly vs the nonelderly at three points in the distribution chain initial sales from manufacturers intermediate purchases by retail pharmacies and final sales from retail pharmacies to patients payors We find that at the initial point in the distribution chain there are no differences in price inflation for the aggregate of drugs destined for use by the elderly vs the nonelderly At the intermediate sell in to pharmacy distribution point we examine antibiotics ABs antidepressants ADs and calcium channel blockers CCBs For ABs since 1992 elderly price inflation is somewhat greater than for the young reflecting in part the elderly's more intensive use of newer branded products having fewer side effects adverse drug interactions and more convenient dosing attributes of particular importance to the elderly For ADs elderly price inflation is considerably less than for the young due in large part to the elderly's greater use of older generic products For CCBs elderly/nonelderly differentials are negligible None of these differentials adjusts for variations in quality At the final retail sell out point we only examine ADs We find that since retailers obtain larger gross margins on generic than on branded products and because the elderly are disproportionately large users of generic ADs the elderly/nonelderly price inflation differential benefiting the elderly at the intermediate point is reduced considerably at final sale
