

POORLY NUTRITIONED AND WEALTHY

CONSEQUENCES OF CLIMATE CHANGE FOR AGRICULTURE

Both developed and developing countries are experiencing significant impacts from climate change on their agriculture and food security. The impacts are expected to be more severe in developing countries due to their higher vulnerability and lower adaptive capacity.

CONSEQUENCES

The impact of climate change on agriculture is expected to be significant. It will lead to a decrease in crop yields, a shift in the growing season, and an increase in the risk of crop failure. This will have a direct impact on food security and the livelihoods of millions of people who depend on agriculture for their income.

In developing countries, the impact of climate change on agriculture is expected to be even more severe. These countries have a higher dependence on agriculture for their income and a lower adaptive capacity. This means that they will be less able to cope with the impacts of climate change, leading to a significant increase in poverty and food insecurity.

The impact of climate change on agriculture is also expected to be more severe in developing countries due to their higher vulnerability and lower adaptive capacity. This means that they will be less able to cope with the impacts of climate change, leading to a significant increase in poverty and food insecurity.

Developed countries have a higher adaptive capacity and are therefore expected to be less affected by climate change. However, they still face significant challenges, such as the loss of biodiversity and the impact on the environment. This means that they will still need to take action to reduce their greenhouse gas emissions and adapt to the impacts of climate change.
