Legislature. Senate. Economic, Community, and Consumer Affairs Committee, 1980 Florida and Tennessee Brady Delander, 2014 While most states require testing in social studies or civic education two states attach consequences for students and schools based on required statewide civics exams Lawmakers in Florida in 2010 and in Tennessee in 2012 approved legislation that holds students accountable for their civics knowledge Students are taking the tests for the first time this school year The two states approaches to accountability in civic education are very different This paper provides a brief overview of the diverse methods Tennessee is using project based exams while Florida is administering tests worth nearly a third of a student's course grade State leaders say both approaches are intended to emphasize the importance of civic knowledge Florida's approach to civics testing mirrors its approach to assessments in other academic areas such as language arts and science. The law initially required middle school students to take a civics course and then pass the civics test in order to be promoted to high school. Now the test counts as 30 percent of the student's total grade in the course which must be passed to advance to high school. In Tennessee the test is project based the first of its kind in the country in civics. It moves students away from pencil and paper standardized tests and toward hands on assessments that ideally engage the students in meaningful real world situations. Students will be assessed at least once in grades 4 through 8 and at least once again in high school grades 9 through 12. This report is the first in a series of reports examining state initiatives related to civic education. For the other reports: States Address Civics with Mandated Task Forces see ED561924 Florida and Illinois Civics Initiatives No Law Required see ED561917 Advancing Civic Learning with Administrative Authority see ED561911 Different Paths to a Common Goal Preparing Students for Civic Life see ED561954 and Secretaries of State Make Impact Lasting Impression in Civics see ED561941.
