1990s. They were the only breed of cattle in the United States that was not affected by mad cow disease. The breed was named after the color of its coat, which was a mix of black and white. The breed was developed in the 1800s by a man named John S. Moore. He was a farmer in the state of Kentucky. He wanted to create a breed of cattle that was hardy and could withstand the harsh weather of the region. He crossed a black cow with a white cow and the result was the Black and White breed. The breed was popular in the 1900s but its numbers declined in the 1950s. It was almost extinct by the 1980s. However, a few dedicated breeders kept the breed alive and today it is once again becoming popular. The breed is known for its hardiness and its ability to thrive in a variety of environments. It is also known for its docile temperament and its ability to produce high-quality meat. The breed is a true American treasure and it is our hope that it will continue to thrive for many years to come.
