

Food Production and Food Safety: Governmental and Private Efforts: Seminar Lecture Summary

Food production is traditionally through farming, ranching and fishing, with hunting, foraging and other methods of subsistence initial preparations, processing and packaging. Recently, there has been a growing trend toward more sustainable agricultural practices. This approach, which is partly fueled by consumer demand, encourages biodiversity, local self-reliance and organic farming methods (Farming without synthetic pesticides). Most food is now produced by large farms, processed industrially and sold in supermarkets and multinational food outlets. Modern food productions has reduced the cost and increased the variety of food available, but this centralization of food supply presents an opportunity for food borne pathogens and toxins to infect and poison large number of consumers. Furthermore, the globalization of Food trade means that food can become contaminated in one country and cause outbreak of food borne illness in another. Modern food production is so complex that a systematic approach is needed to identify the hazards of each point in the food chain. For this, Food safety is receiving more attention worldwide with the rising incidence of food borne diseases. In many countries, responsibility for food safety is divided among several agencies with overlapping authority. This situation has led to a disjointed strategy for the protection of human health from food borne diseases in some countries. Following the lead of a number of developed countries, the Department of Food safety, Zoo noses and Food borne Diseases (FDS) is working to transfer the technology for an integrated production to consumer approach to food safety to member states. This approach will offer significant increases for the mitigation of food borne diseases. Such an approach relies mainly on the hazard Analysis Critical Control Point System (HACCP), which has been advocated by WHO for nearly 20 years.

HAZARD ANALYSIS CRITICAL CONTROL POINT CONCEPT

An important development in improving food safety has been the application of the Hazard Analysis Critical Control Point Concept (HACCP), which is a systematic approach to identify, accessing and controlling hazards, borrowed from aerospace industry. It can be applied to all sectors of the food chain from primary production through food processing, manufacture, distribution and retailing to the point of ones consumption, it focuses on identifying the main avenue of risk and tackling them.

SEVEN STEPS OF HACCP

1. Analyze hazards - Potential hazards associated with food and measures.
2. Identify critical controls points- these are points in the food chain at which the potential hazards can be controlled or eliminated.
3. Establish preventive measures with critical limits for each control points -for a cooked food, e.g this might include setting the minimum cooking temperature and time required to ensure the elimination of any microbes.
