

Enzymes and Cellular Regulation

What are the immediate regulatory events which control metabolism?

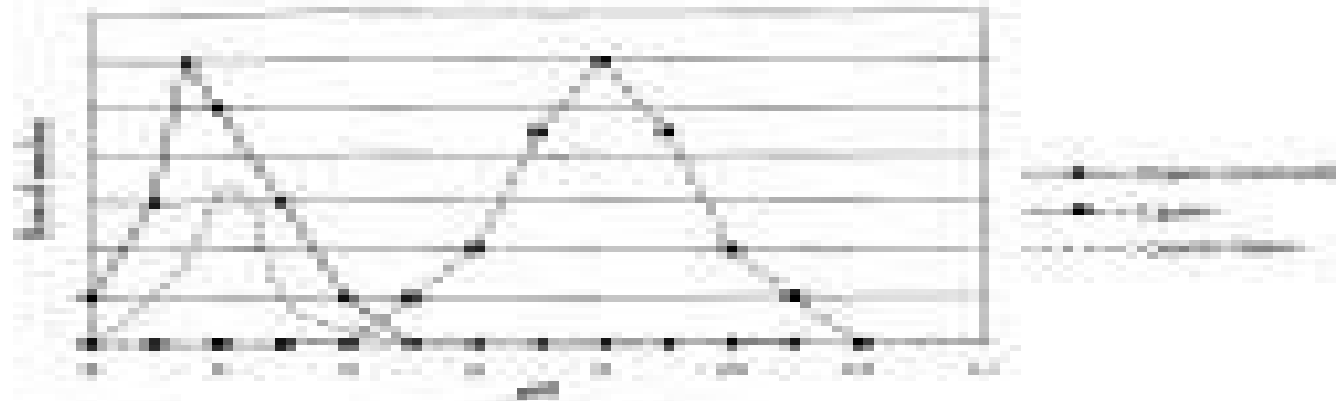

Why?

Enzymes regulate our genetic based biological activities that play important roles in our lives. They help control cellular activities, coordinate their activities, and are responsible for maintaining cellular life. We can identify various factors that regulate enzymes, for example, with allosteric. These are factors outside of their substrates, often a few molecules. They can work like a lock, preventing or forcing substrate to fit, and they can work like a changeover switch for two different reactions. The specific enzyme binds to both the substrate and changeover factor in the right manner, while proper conditions exist in the system.
