This image shows a detailed view of a manual transmission's internal components. The focus is on the shift mechanism, which includes several shift forks mounted on a central shaft. The forks are used to move sliding sleeves along the shaft to engage different gears. The gears themselves are visible in the background, showing their teeth and varying diameters. The assembly is made of various metals, including steel and aluminum. A blue plastic component is visible in the center, likely a synchronizer sleeve. The lighting is bright, highlighting the metallic surfaces and the intricate design of the parts.
