He was not the weather worn soldier who had fought in rain and mud with Kitchener's Mob which he so clearly portrayed some years before. He lacked the dignity of a hero made famous on the entire western front by his deeds and daring. This slightly built aviator with a keen brown eye was just Hall. One's inclination was to slap him on the back and to call him Jim. We had all read his tales of High Adventure which are familiar to the Atlantic Monthly's readers. When asked to describe his previous experience in falling two miles with a bullet in his shoulder, engine going at full speed and miraculously regaining consciousness in time to straighten out three hundred feet above ground, landing in a French first line trench, he said smiling, "You'll have to excuse the attempts of an amateur. That was when I first began." High Adventure James Norman Hall, 1918 It was on a cool starlit evening early in September 1916 that I first met Drew of Massachusetts and actually began my adventures as a prospective member of the Escadrille Americaine. We had sailed from New York by the same boat, had made our applications for enlistment in the Foreign Legion on the same day without being aware of each other's existence, and in Paris while waiting for our papers we had gone every evening for dinner to the same large and gloomy looking restaurant in the neighborhood of the Seine. As for the restaurant we frequented, it was not assuredly because of the quality of the food. We might have dined better and more cheaply elsewhere. But there was an air of vanished splendor, of faded magnificence about the place which in the capital of a warring nation appealed to both of us. Every evening the tables were laid with spotless linen and shining silver. The wineglasses caught the light from the tarnished chandeliers in little points of color. At the dinner hour a half dozen ancient serving men silently took their places about the room. There was not a sound to be heard except the occasional far off honk of a motor or the subdued clatter of dishes from the kitchens. The serving men, even the tables and the empty chairs seemed to be listening, to be waiting for the guests who never came. Rarely were there more than a dozen diners out during the course of an evening. There was something mysterious in these elaborate preparations and something rather fine about them as well, but one thought not without a touch of sadness of the old days when there had been laughter and lights and music, sparkling wines and brilliant talk, and how those merry-makers had gone, many of them long ago to the wars.
