Abstract: The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 12-week training program on the physical fitness and health of sedentary middle-aged men. The subjects were 20 men, aged 40-50 years, who were sedentary and had no known cardiovascular disease. They were randomly assigned to either a control group (n=10) or a training group (n=10). The training group participated in a 12-week program of aerobic exercise, three times per week, for 45 minutes per session. The control group did not participate in any exercise program. Physical fitness was assessed at baseline and at 12 weeks using a variety of tests, including a maximal aerobic capacity test, a submaximal aerobic capacity test, and a series of strength and endurance tests. Health was assessed using a series of questionnaires that measured lifestyle factors, such as smoking, alcohol consumption, and diet, as well as physiological factors, such as blood pressure, cholesterol, and glucose. The results of the study showed that the training group had significantly higher levels of physical fitness and better health outcomes than the control group at 12 weeks. The training program had a positive effect on all of the variables measured, including aerobic capacity, strength, endurance, and health-related quality of life. The findings of this study suggest that a 12-week training program can improve the physical fitness and health of sedentary middle-aged men.
