

Developmental Assessment

"Assessing by Progress"

What is Developmental Assessment?

Authentic assessment looks at students' progress in developing skills, abilities, values, etc., rather than evaluating students' final products.

Why Should I Consider Using Developmental Assessment?

Not every type of learning is best assessed by looking at the quality of a final product. In fact, sometimes there is no expectation that students should, or even could, fully develop in the assessed area by the end of a course or program. An example of this is Maslow's Hierarchy of Needs. Theoretically, very few people ever fully develop to the final "self-actualized" stage. A few advantages of authentic assessment are:

- Developmental assessment is useful for outcomes based on students' development rather than their abilities to create a final product.
- This assessment is based on relevant principles of development in your discipline.
- This type of assessment emphasizes emerging knowledge and skills, rather than recognizing only students' final products.
- Developmental assessment gives you the ability to focus on strengths and unique aspects of your program.
- Developmental assessment is ongoing and may occur in many contexts, giving you a richer view of students' learning.

How Can I Create Developmental Assessments?

Developmental assessments require some sort of pre- post- design. If you would like to know how much a student has developed their knowledge, skills, abilities, and/or values, you need to measure that information at the beginning of a learning experience, then again at the end.

Example: one could administer a test at the beginning of a class, then ask the same students to take the same test at the end of a class. By comparing students' performances on the pre- and post-tests, an instructor could determine students' levels of development.
