

Maluti-a-Phofung

Maluti has consolidated the provision function previously undertaken by two water boards in previous homeland areas and towns into a new public utility wholly owned by the municipality. It has signed a management contract with a local company associated with the Suez Group of France. The case study provides important insights into the application of the public-public-private approach, first used in Johannesburg, to a municipality with less capacity serving a relatively remote area with significant rural challenges. This case is particularly interesting given the growing trend internationally toward management contracts. The case study is based on municipal, financial, and participatory community research.
