There are different definitions of what constitutes a "strong" or "weak" form of a word. In this study, the following definitions were used: a "strong" form is a word that is pronounced with a clear, distinct sound, while a "weak" form is a word that is pronounced with a less distinct sound. For example, the word "cat" is a strong form, while the word "kitten" is a weak form.

The study's National Geographic Society scientists found that the honeybees' DNA differences may be because of their social organization. Honey bees have a queen, who produces all the eggs, and a few males, who mate with the queen. The rest of the colony consists of female workers that do all the other tasks. The researchers found that the honeybees' DNA differences were not related to their social organization, but to their geographic location.
