

"The End"

She never got out of bed. The sheets were tossed and tangled where her legs had wrestled with his. They smelled like stale cologne, sweat and leftover passion. There was a smear of color from the lipstick she was wearing three days ago on the pillow next to her. Now the color was faded from brilliant red to barely-there pink. It was hardly visible amongst the fresh black rubbed in from her wet mascara. In the background the muffled sound of a television next door soothed her slightly. She listened to breakfast being made and the shower running, the hunt for shoes and the jingle of car keys, the television being silenced. The sound of a door being slammed carelessly closed...then silence. It reminded her vaguely that she had things that needed to be done; a job to show up to, a dog to feed. She needed another day, she thought, she'd feel better tomorrow. She rolled over.
