

New words:

Home steads	Houses with surrounding land and small buildings.
Archaeologist	A person who studies the past by looking at objects or parts of old buildings that are buried in the ground.
Ritual	A religious ceremony or process.

- A thousand years ago in Southern Africa, people lived in small family homesteads and independent villages.
- It was an equal kind of society.
- Each family farmed crops like sorghum and millet and kept a few cattle and goats.
- Farmers planted crops on the same land for only a few years and then started new fields.
- Sometimes they moved their villages to new sites.
- There was little conflict because there was plenty of land and people could move away if anyone became too powerful.
- People made iron tools and copper wire, which they traded with their neighbours and other villages.
- There was no contact with people outside Southern Africa.

Development in later farming villages

- After about 900 AD, some villages began to grow bigger than others.
- From the size of their cattle enclosures, these villages must have had more cattle than others.
- In bigger villages, archaeologists have found many clay figures that must have been used in religious ceremonies.
- These clay figures of cattle probably had some ritual meaning in the later farming societies.
- Some families were becoming richer and had more religious power than others.
