Learning Under Fire: Training an Army While at War, 1996 This monograph examines the abilities of armies to train themselves while actually fighting a war Modern doctrine as expressed in FM 100-5 and TRADOC PAM 525 tacitly assumes that the U S Army's peacetime training is adequate for any conflict that might arise In making this assumption doctrine ignores several lessons from history in which armies have had to modify their training to suit the needs of battlefields on which they were actively engaged In its analysis of the topic the monograph begins by defining the two forms of adaptation during conflict reform and innovation as expressed by Professor Stephen P Rosen in his book Winning the Next War Innovation and the Modern Military This analysis establishes the theoretical background for the conduct of two case studies used to illustrate adaptive behavior of military organizations while at war The first is the German Army's successful effort at reform following the Polish Campaign in 1939 as it readied itself for the invasion of the West The second case study reflects an unsuccessful attempt at innovation as illustrated by the U S Army in Vietnam In both examples each army's training programs are assessed to discern how their training programs contributed to their ultimate success In the final analysis the monograph draws conclusions from the case studies relevant to current U S training doctrine to determine its utility in preparing the Army to train under fire It ends with several recommendations to improve both doctrine and force structure to ensure that if the Army is not prepared for the next war it will be able to get it right faster than its opponent
