Abstract: The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 12-week training program on the physical fitness and health-related quality of life of sedentary, middle-aged adults. The study was a randomized controlled trial. The intervention group (n = 20) participated in a 12-week training program, while the control group (n = 20) remained sedentary. The training program consisted of three sessions per week, each lasting 45 minutes. The sessions included aerobic exercise, strength training, and flexibility exercises. The control group did not participate in any training program. The primary outcome was the change in physical fitness, measured by the 6-minute walk test (6MWT) and the 10-meter walk test (10MWT). Secondary outcomes included changes in health-related quality of life, measured by the SF-36 questionnaire. The results showed that the intervention group had significantly greater improvements in physical fitness and health-related quality of life compared to the control group. The findings suggest that a 12-week training program can improve physical fitness and health-related quality of life in sedentary, middle-aged adults.

Abstract

These studies indicate an important role for a person's ability to identify a problem and to develop strategies to solve it. In addition, these studies indicate that a person's ability to identify a problem and to develop strategies to solve it is a function of the person's ability to identify a problem and to develop strategies to solve it.
