

- The boys and girls are divided into separate leagues that never get a chance to play against each other.
- Messner proposes that: The formal sex segregation of children does not, in and of itself, make gender overtly salient. In fact, when children are absolutely segregated, with no opportunity for cross sex interactions, gender may disappear as an overtly salient organizing principle
- It is only when the two sexually segregated sexes interact do high charged reactions become possible.
- The soccer league was originally coed, but it became sexually segregated when the coaches noticed that boys and girls split up at half time. They thought that splitting the sex will lead to greater team unity
- Messner suggested that you wouldn't split teams by race, but the comment was ignored. This proves the fact that the need for sex segregation seems to be viewed as natural and necessary in sports.
- The formal and informal gender regime of AYSO made the Barbie girls versus sea monsters moment possible, but it did not make it inevitable. The other driving force gender construction is gender

The Culture of Gender

- Cultural symbols such as team colours, uniforms, songs, team names often carry encoded gendered meanings that were then available to be taken up by the children in ways that constructed (or potentially contested) gender divisions and boundaries

Team names

- Each team were issued two team colors. It is notable that across various age-groups, several girls' teams were issued pink uniforms while no pink were assigned to boys.
- The children were then told to choose their own team names and were encouraged to use their assigned team colors as cues to theme of the team name.
- The team names were analyzed and broken into three categories: 1) sweet names (Barbie dolls) 2) Neutral names with no obvious gender connotation 3) power names names that invoke images of strength and aggression (sea monster)
- Across all age categories, the boys were far more likely to choose a power name than anything else
- For girls, the tendency to choose power names increases with age but is still not common as boys

Barbie Narrative vs. Warrior Narrative

- Barbie: Symbol of femininity around the world. Conservative parents are happy to buy Barbie for their daughters but deflect their son's interest by giving them action figures.
- Feminists see all these symbols and resent the doll. They refuse to buy Barbies because they assume all these characteristics embodied by this doll will be passed onto their daughters.
- The Barbie vs. Sea monsters moment can be analyzed as a "receptive context" in which differently situated boys, girls and parents variously used Barbie to construct pleasurable intergroup bonds as well as boundaries between groups
- The assumption is that as adults we analyze Barbie's content and then presume it passes untransformed into children's minds where, dwelling beneath the control of consciousness or counterargument, it generates self-image, feelings, and other ideological constructs
- In fact, people who are situated differently tend to consume and construct meanings around
