

An overview of the integrative research review

The integrative literature review has many benefits to the scholarly reviewer, including evaluating the strength of the scientific evidence, identifying gaps in current research, identifying the need for future research, bridging between related areas of work, identifying central issues in an area, generating a research question, identifying a theoretical or conceptual framework, and exploring which research methods have been used successfully. The 5-stage integrative review process includes (1) problem formulation, (2) data collection or literature search, (3) evaluation of data, (4) data analysis, and (5) interpretation and presentation of results. Maintaining scientific integrity while conducting an integrative research review involves careful consideration to threats to validity. Strategies to overcome these threats are reviewed. The integrative review methodology must involve detailed and thoughtful work, the outcome of which can be a significant contribution to a particular body of knowledge and, consequently, to practice and research.

As specialization increases and the volume of completed research expands, the scholarly individual is constantly challenged to possess an accurate and current understanding of information pertinent to his or her area of practice and/or research. Integrative reviews assist in maintaining a current knowledge base in a particular research area.<sup>1</sup> An integrative review of the literature is defined as one in which "past research is summarized by drawing overall conclusions from many studies."<sup>2(p1)</sup> Through the process of systematically analyzing and summarizing the research literature, a well-prepared integrative review can precisely represent the state of the current research literature. The integrative literature review can also be used to evaluate the strength of the scientific evidence, identify gaps in current research, identify the need for future research, build a bridge between related areas of work, identify central issues in an area, generate a research question, identify a theoretical or conceptual framework, and explore which research methods have been used successfully.<sup>1</sup>

Several terms are closely associated with the integrative review including literature review, systematic review, and meta-analysis. A literature review is "a critical summary of research on a topic of interest, often prepared to put a research problem in context."<sup>3(p12)</sup> The literature review is frequently found at the beginning of scholarly research articles providing a foundation for the proposed research questions and methods.<sup>4</sup> A systematic review is "carefully synthesized research evidence designed to answer focused clinical questions."<sup>5(p)</sup> Stevens notes, "systematic reviews are also known as evidence summaries and integrative reviews."<sup>6(p)</sup> Finally, a meta-analysis is "a technique for quantitatively combining and thus integrating the results of multiple studies on a given topic."<sup>7(p12)</sup> In addition, primary research should be differentiated from the integrative review process. Table 1 delineates the similarities and differences.

Generally, there are 4 questions that the reviewer answers when a body of knowledge is evaluated using the integrative review technique. (1) What is known? (2) What is the quality of what is known? (3) What should be known? and (4) What is the next step for research or practice? The answers to these questions are discovered through the integrative review process. The reviewer evaluates the current state of knowledge, judging its quality so that the future directions for research studies in the area are clearer.

Definitions

The process of conducting an integrative literature review should be approached with the same intensity and scientific rigor used when conducting primary research. Cooper<sup>8</sup> conceptualizes the integrative review as occurring in 5 stages: (1) problem formulation, (2) data collection or literature search, (3) evaluation of data, (4) data analysis, and (5) interpretation and presentation of results.

To focus the integrative review, the reviewer must begin by defining the purpose,<sup>9</sup> the problem,<sup>9</sup> and the
