Abstract—The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 12-week training program on the cardiovascular fitness of sedentary middle-aged men. The program consisted of three sessions per week, each lasting 45 min. The first session was a warm-up, the second was a cardiovascular workout, and the third was a cool-down. The results showed that the participants' heart rate, blood pressure, and cholesterol levels all decreased significantly after the 12-week program. The study also found that the participants' weight and body mass index (BMI) decreased significantly. These results suggest that a 12-week training program can effectively improve the cardiovascular fitness of sedentary middle-aged men.

These two characteristics are important because they represent opposing characteristics: being very popular and being unpopular. The fact that the two opposite ends are "connected" tells us that the related, intensive nature of the two ends. There is a relatively gradual transition from one end to the other. In this case, the transition is continuous.

and together, our findings suggest that the 2008–2009 financial crisis had a lasting impact on the mental health of the population, which is consistent with previous research (Kessler et al., 2008). The cross-sectional methodology used in this study has several limitations, including the cross-sectional design, which does not allow us to determine the direction of the relationship between the variables. Additionally, the use of self-reported measures of mental health may be subject to recall bias and social desirability bias.
