Introduction

This paper helps to compare and contrast the idea of Swale, Saltz & Sommers as well as that of Bartholomae concerning the issue of learning. As presented by the author of the utilized three articles, education or learning was something which community members acquired through developing interest and thereby being in a position to involve themselves in any sort of discourse of their choice. All these three sources authors had an experience of dealing with linguistics. However, at some point their perception differed since they had different view point of the same issue. Thus, different approaches have been shown which the authors of the three sources presented. Upon being enlighten, community members are in a position to critically analyze matters of interest and not just following what other people presents without reasoning. Actually, both Swale and Saltz & Sommers compares the matter with college students who perceives learning in a different manner.

Notably, Saltz & Sommers analyzed the aspect of college students having interest in writing even after finishing their studies while others no longer had the passion after they were through with their education. In this case, the authors gave more attention to freshman and it was noticed that the students who did extensive writing during their college years easily adopted the writing culture even after they left college (Sommers & Saltz, 2004). Similarly, in his work; Swale presented that learning was something continuous and it took an individual's interest and right perception to acquire and maintain. In this case, he presented that unlike a speech community a discourse community would easily find time and engage in extensive research concerning a specific subject thereby being in a position to attain higher level of knowledge concerning the subject.

On the other hand, Swale discusses and compared the discourse and speech community. In this case he showed that unlike the discourse community, the speech community shares knowledge of speech interpretation and the rules of conduct. Thus, one has to be familiar with at least a speech of one form and have experience of the use of pattern in the statement. In most cases, this is the opposite unnecessary description of the discourse community. In the same manner, Saltz & Sommers showed that college students having the writing skill was as a result of not losing interest in the skill even after completing studies. Thus, the experienced change of college students no longer writing was a choice that resulted from the decision of the concerned persons.

Notably, Swale used the term discourse community to show a group of ideas that a particular language can have and this generates the social behaviors of the group. In this case, the discourse extends and maintains the knowledge that a group has and at the same time supports the initiation of new members in that specific group (Swales, 1990). Hence the discourse community was a group of active individuals who wished to always learn new ideas. However, Saltz & Sommers the term writing students to signify those serious individuals who had the courage and boldness to pursue what they had learnt and put it into practice. In this case, those students who never gave up on their writing skills even after they completed their studies were presented as focused individual in life who had the ability to handle tasks of different forms (Sommers & Saltz, 2004).
