Abstract: Supervisory staff in child protective agencies (CPAs) are responsible for investigating reports of child abuse and neglect, assessing the risk to children, and ensuring that appropriate services are provided to protect and support children and families. This study examined the experiences of supervisory staff in CPAs across the United States, focusing on their perceptions of the challenges they face in their work. The study used a qualitative approach, with data collected from 12 semi-structured interviews with supervisory staff from five different CPAs. The findings of the study identified several key challenges that supervisory staff face in their work, including: (1) limited resources, (2) high caseloads, (3) complex cases, (4) lack of training and support, and (5) emotional toll. The study also identified several strategies that supervisory staff use to cope with these challenges, including: (1) seeking support from colleagues, (2) prioritizing cases, (3) using evidence-based practices, and (4) self-care. The study has several implications for practice and policy, including the need for increased resources, training, and support for supervisory staff in CPAs.
