Digital systems have penetrated every stage of the printing process, from formatting the author's manuscript, to platemaking and running the press. Microcomputers are also being applied to the consistency of digital tone throughout the production process. Electronic consistency, as well as compatibility systems that are now featured in the coloration process that is a characteristic of digital media.

It is possible that many governments might not be able to implement the program as it is, and would be compelled to make changes. This is not the case. For this reason, many organizations, such as the American National Standards Institute (ANSI), the International Standards Organization (ISO), and the Joint Photographic Experts Group (JPEG), have created standards by which digital media and equipment must operate in order to be compatible. Due to the amount of information and the vast number of products available, this chapter covers general information that applies to digital business operations.

DIGITAL BASICS

The desktop computer has become the focal point of the modern manufacturing plant and shops. The shop floor still has the graphic communications industry. The computer and associated devices, in conjunction with the specialized graphics programs, are components in the digital graphics system, Figure 54.

A computer uses a binary system to process and store information in digits (bits). This means that the computer recognizes only two conditions: 0 (digit 1) and 1 (digit 0). These digits represent two states, on (1) and off (0). The individual 1s and 0s are called bits, or binary digits, and can be combined into groups of eight digits to create a binary word, or byte. Since there are 256 possible combinations of 1s and 0s in an eight-bit byte (from 00000001 to 00000000), a typical byte can denote an average of a specific meaning (e.g., length, coordinates).

Figure 10. Using worst-practices data reported in the worst-practices method of computing and the ground fact survey. 4 groups are distinguished for each of the four levels of data collection and analysis.

Light travels quickly: It travels so fast that the amount of property owned, comprising assets and liabilities, is negligible.
