

2. How important are the consequences of our actions when making moral decisions?

The consequences of our actions are very significant when making moral decisions to the extent that one must assess divergent forms of actions by getting the facts, or through the different forms of results of such an action. It is noteworthy to consider the moral rights of a person when making a moral decision, its fairness and with consideration of moral principles. Otherwise stated, one must assess all alternative actions and choose the one with the best overall outcomes, one that best respects the rights of the person, with sense of equality, draws for the common good, and with moral virtues (Velasquez et al., 1996).

3. Does adherence to virtues offer a complete solution to everyday moral dilemmas?

Moral dilemmas can only be settled when a person is virtuous; thus, adherence to virtues makes a person become ethical. Virtues are traits or behaviours that reinforce oneself to become and act in approaches that will enhance highest potential. They will enable one to fulfill the ideals one has adapted. Exemplaries of virtues may include courage, fidelity, prudence, and fairness. These virtues become traits of a person when required. It must be noted that once persons have embraced virtues, they will naturally act in different approaches constant with moral principles (Velasquez et al., 1996). Therefore, in the virtue approach, moral dilemmas can be easily resolved by a virtuous person.
