Abstract Background: The purpose of this study was to determine the prevalence of self-reported depression among the adult population in the United States and to examine the association between self-reported depression and demographic and socioeconomic factors. Methods: Data were obtained from the 2002 National Health and Medical Examination Survey, a nationally representative survey of the U.S. population. The prevalence of self-reported depression was estimated among adults aged 18 years and older. The association between self-reported depression and demographic and socioeconomic factors was examined using logistic regression. Results: The prevalence of self-reported depression was 10.1% among adults aged 18 years and older. The prevalence of self-reported depression was higher among females than males, and among those with lower education and income. Conclusion: The prevalence of self-reported depression is high among the adult population in the United States. The association between self-reported depression and demographic and socioeconomic factors suggests that depression is a public health problem that affects a large portion of the population.
