The future of the European Union Great Britain: Parliament: House of Commons: Foreign Affairs Committee, 2013-06-11 Proposals for reforms for the EU as a whole are likely to find a more favourable reception than possible requests for further special treatment for the UK The Committee is sceptical that other Member States would be willing to renegotiate existing EU law so as to allow the UK on its own to reduce its degree of integration especially where this could be seen as undermining the integrity of the Single Market Other Member States appear to want the UK to remain an EU Member Closer Eurozone integration is a potential risk to the position of the UK and other non Eurozone states in the EU However the December 2012 agreement on the Single Supervisory Mechanism for banking regulation shows what the UK can achieve to protect its position The Eurozone is in any case far from a homogenous bloc and the expansion and closer integration of the Eurozone does not therefore necessarily render the UK s position in the EU impossible or worthless This report does not examine whether the UK should remain in the EU or withdraw However it agrees with the Government that if the UK were to leave the EU the current arrangements for relations with the EU which are maintained by Norway or Switzerland would not be appropriate for the UK If it is in the UK's interest to remain in the Single Market the UK should either remain in the EU or launch an effort for radical institutional change in Europe to give decision making rights in the Single Market to all its participating states
