It is worth also noting that very few respondents following the 1995 elections perceived the new strategy as a source of organizational failure. There are only two specific questions in the survey that the new strategy may not have met. Of the eight "least successful" strategies, 4 out of 5 of the newly-elected leaders chose this strategy. Likewise, respondents seemed to find the performance of using large, high-profile events to attract the public most to be the least effective of a collection of strategies. Therefore, we can see that the use of new techniques, although not necessarily the larger leaders' first choice, had been recognized by the survey as being more successful than the strategies favored by the 1991 non-leader respondents.
