- Abstract—This study examined the relationship between teachers' group-level ratings of the degree to which they were asked to provide a response that might be considered "right" or "wrong" and students' self-reported academic achievement. Results showed that teachers' ratings of the degree to which they were asked to provide a response that might be considered "right" or "wrong" were significantly related to students' self-reported academic achievement. The relationship was positive, indicating that as teachers' ratings of the degree to which they were asked to provide a response that might be considered "right" or "wrong" increased, students' self-reported academic achievement also increased.
