Skeletal Muscle Lab Report

Introduction

This lab was completed to demonstrate the change in the muscle that happens as the ATP enters into the muscle. This protein, including others, causes the muscles to contract and relax, moving the body and bones. In this lab, there were many different problems that were apparent in the lab. Some of the strands that were measured in the lab were too large. This made it hard because when zooming in or out, it was very easy to lose your place on the strand.

The muscle relies heavily on calcium to cause contractions within the muscle. The muscle is made up of many different organelles and bodies that help the muscle contract and relax. The main organelle is the sarcomere, that reacts with myosin and actin to cause the contraction. Once the sarcoplasmic reticulum releases calcium ions, the work to bind with troponin, which causes tropomyosin to face the actin which then binds with myosin to cause contraction. This happens in figure 1b, after the muscles become wider than figure 1a. The table 1 represents this data, because as the muscle becomes contracted, it becomes shorter. Relaxation comes from the opposite of the contraction reaction. The calcium ions that originally was released to bind to the troponin, is released and pumped back into the sarcoplasmic reticulum. This causes a break in the link between actin and myosin, causing the muscle to go back to its dormant state of relaxation. This is apparent in figure 1a, because the muscles are relaxed.
