LAIB: A collaborative community survey tool for biodiversity assessment

Introduction

Biological communities or ecosystems provide the basis of ecosystem services, or environmental goods that humans enjoy and benefit from. Current globalized bio-trade is particularly problematic because it causes significant biodiversity loss through overexploitation of natural resources. Climate change also poses a threat to biodiversity. Biodiversity loss can negatively affect ecosystem services and thus pose long-term threats to human well-being, including food security. Climate change can trigger biodiversity loss and vice versa.

However, there are many ways to mitigate biodiversity loss and restore healthy ecosystems. These approaches are called ecosystem-based adaptation (EBA). These approaches prevent biodiversity loss and climate change from becoming vicious cycles. However, there are many challenges to EBA.

- 1. generate environmental and social baseline information for the ecosystem under study and explore how environmental degradation and human impacts threaten biodiversity
- 2. use these evaluations for developing adaptive actions to manage biodiversity surveys and management plans for long-term sustainability.

Program

What does professionals know about the relationship between the environment and their living? Are individuals and their families more aware of the importance of biodiversity?
