Abstract: Phragmites australis (Cyperaceae) is a dominant species in coastal wetlands of the United States. It is a highly invasive species that can outcompete native species and alter the structure and function of wetland ecosystems. The purpose of this study was to investigate the effects of Phragmites invasion on the structure and function of a coastal wetland. We measured the biomass, height, and density of Phragmites and native species, and we measured the rates of photosynthesis and respiration of Phragmites and native species. We found that Phragmites invasion significantly increased the biomass, height, and density of Phragmites and significantly decreased the biomass, height, and density of native species. We also found that Phragmites had significantly higher rates of photosynthesis and respiration than native species. These results suggest that Phragmites invasion can alter the structure and function of coastal wetlands.
