- Abstract The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 12-week, low-intensity, supervised walking program on the physical and psychological health of sedentary, middle-aged women. The study was a randomized, controlled trial. The subjects were 40 sedentary, middle-aged women who were randomly assigned to either a supervised walking program or a control group. The walking program consisted of 12 weeks of walking, 3 times per week, for 30 minutes per session. The control group consisted of 20 women who did not participate in the walking program. The subjects were assessed at baseline and at 12 weeks. The walking program had a significant positive effect on the physical and psychological health of the subjects. The walking program significantly improved the subjects' physical health, as measured by the 6-minute walk test, the 10-minute step test, and the 12-minute step test. The walking program also significantly improved the subjects' psychological health, as measured by the Beck Depression Inventory and the State-Trait Anxiety Inventory. The walking program had no significant effect on the subjects' weight, blood pressure, or cholesterol levels. The results of this study suggest that a 12-week, low-intensity, supervised walking program can improve the physical and psychological health of sedentary, middle-aged women.

Background

Spinal cord injury (SCI) is a serious medical condition that can result in permanent disability. The most common cause of SCI is trauma, such as a fall or a car accident. Other causes include degenerative diseases, infections, and tumors. SCI can affect any part of the spine, but the most common site of injury is the cervical spine (neck). The lumbar spine (lower back) is the second most common site of injury.

The lumbar spine is responsible for supporting the weight of the upper body and for allowing movement. It is composed of five vertebrae, each with a corresponding intervertebral disc. The discs are made of a soft, gelatinous material called nucleus pulposus, which is surrounded by a tough, fibrous ring called the annulus fibrosus. The discs act as shock absorbers, cushioning the vertebrae and allowing them to move relative to each other.

When a vertebra is injured, the disc can be damaged, leading to a herniation. A herniation occurs when the nucleus pulposus tears through the annulus fibrosus, causing it to protrude and press against the spinal cord or the nerves that exit the spine. This can result in pain, numbness, and weakness in the legs.

There are several treatment options for SCI, including surgery, physical therapy, and medication. Surgery is often the most effective treatment, as it can remove the damaged disc and decompress the spinal cord. Physical therapy can help to strengthen the muscles and improve flexibility. Medication can help to reduce pain and inflammation.

The purpose of this study was to evaluate the effectiveness of a new surgical technique for treating lumbar SCI. The technique involves a minimally invasive approach, which allows for a smaller incision and less damage to the surrounding tissue. The study compared the results of this technique to those of a traditional open surgical approach.
