

For each question below, explain whether the evidence is comparative anatomy (homologous structures), comparative anatomy (analogous structures), DNA analysis, or from the fossil record. Then, using complete sentences, explain why it is evidence of evolution, or that life changes over time.

Example:

1. Humans, chimpanzees, whales, and bats all have the same bones in their arms, fins, or wings.
  - a. What type of evidence is this? Comparative anatomy (homologous structures)
  - b. Why is this evidence of evolution?

This suggests evolution because if various animals share the same bone structure, it likely means they all originated from a common ancestor that possessed those bones long ago. Over time, some descendants adapted into humans, while others became whales, bats, or chimpanzees.

2. Scientists find fossilized bones of a huge animal that doesn't exist today.
  - a. What type of evidence is this? Fossil record
  - b. Why is this evidence of evolution? The fossil record provides a timeline of past life forms, showing species' gradual changes over time and revealing ancestral connections. Fossilized bones from extinct animals indicate their past existence and potential evolutionary changes, leading to the emergence of different species, resembling or even being undistinguishable compared to their ancestors.
3. The human gene for your muscle protein is different from monkey muscle protein in 4 places and different from a chicken's gene in 25 places.
  - a. What type of evidence is this? DNA analysis
  - b. Why is this evidence of evolution? The fewer genetic differences between humans and monkeys which is 4 compared to 25 differences between humans and chickens suggests a closer evolutionary relationship between humans and monkeys than between humans and chickens.
4. Honey possums lick nectar from flowers using a long tongue made of soft muscle. Butterflies lick nectar from flowers using a long tongue made of hard protein.
  - a. What type of evidence is this? Comparative anatomy (analogous structures)
  - b. Why is this evidence of evolution? This illustrates evolution as two distantly related organisms, such as a marsupial/pouched mammal (Honey possums) and an insect (Butterflies), possess limbs with similar functions but different structures. This similarity suggests that they coexisted in the same environment and independently evolved to fulfill the same function, adapting to survive in their shared habitat.
