

Population Genetics and Evolution

LAB 8A- PTC

Introduction:

In 1908, G.H.Hardy and W. Weinberg independently suggested a scheme whereby evolution could be viewed as changes in frequency of alleles in a population of organisms. In this scheme, if A and a are alleles for a particular gene locus and each diploid individual has two such loci, then p can be designated as the frequency of the A allele and q as the frequency of the a allele. For example, in a population of 100 individuals (each with two loci) in which 40% of the alleles are A, p would be 0.40. The rest of the alleles would be (60%) would be a and q would be equal to 0.60. p + q = 1. These are referred to as allele frequencies. The frequency of the possible diploid combinations of these alleles (AA, Aa, aa) is expressed as p² + 2pq + q² = 1.0. Hardy and Weinberg also argued that if 5 conditions are met, the population's alleles and genotype frequencies will remain constant from generation to generation. These conditions are as follows:

- The breeding population is large. (Reduces the problem of genetic drift.)
- Mating is random. (Individual show no preference for a particular mating type.)
- There is no mutation of the alleles.
- No differential migration occurs. (No immigration or emigration.)
- There is no selection. (All genotypes have an equal chance of surviving and reproducing.)

The Hardy-Weinberg equation describes an existing situation. Of what value is such a rule? It provides a yardstick by which changes in allelic frequencies can be measured. If a population's allelic frequencies change, it is undergoing evolution.

Background:

Estimating Allele Frequencies for a Specific Trait within a Sample Population:

Using the class as a sample population, the allele frequency of a gene controlling the ability to taste the chemical PTC (phenylthiocarbamide) could be estimated. A bitter taste reaction is evidence of the presence of a dominant allele in either a homozygous (AA) or heterozygous (Aa) condition. The inability to taste the PTC is dependent on the presence of the two recessive alleles (aa). To estimate the frequency of the PTC -tasting allele in the population, one must find p. To find p, one must first determine q (the frequency of the non tasting allele). PTC trait has been shown to correlate with a number of dietary preferences and thus may have important implications for human health. This gene is a member of the family of bitter taste receptor genes. It exists in seven different allelic forms, although only two of these, designated the major taster and major non- taster forms, exist at high frequency. The two major forms differ from each other at three amino acid positions.
