very much. First, while accepting the importance of the Asian crisis for the development of the IFA, it need not take six chapters to reach the conclusion that the IMF's policy response was the product of a particular reading of the crisis. Second, the book could have benefited from Foucault's work being more integrated in Vestergaard's analysis, rather than outlined in separate chapters. Related to the previous points, I admittedly did not appreciate reading so many heavily quoted, chapter-long summaries of other scholars' work. Lastly, the book does not add much to what already exists in the form of proposals for new financial regulation. Criticism aside, I found the book's most interesting aspect to be how Foucault's work is used instrumentally with the aim of improving (neo-) liberal governance. Overall, Vestergaard's is much more of a (neo-)liberal voice engaged in first-order problematization, than a Foucauldian voice engaged in critical second-order reproblemization.

Ethnicity and cultural politics

The crisis of Islamic civilization. By Ali A. Allawi. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2009. 304pp. £28.00. ISBN 978 0 30013 931 0.

To pick, as Ali Allawi has done in this book, a very challenging topic which has been in discussion for over two centuries, and to presume to provide answers where many a formidable mind has failed before, is to set oneself a daunting challenge. Allawi starts on a personal note, contrasting the easy-going, largely secular Iraq of the 1950s where he grew up, with later developments in the Muslim world where the 'tide of militant Islam seemed unstoppable' everywhere. By the time he became a minister in American-occupied Iraq after 2003, Islamist parties were the dominant actors on the political arena. However, these parties did not appear to be interested in anything religious. Their leaders' main concern was to amass power and wealth by any means, while the rank and file engaged in murderous, no-holds-barred sectarian wars.

The main point Allawi makes, however, is that the trials and travails of militant Islam are only a symptom of a deeper malaise that has infected the 'Islamic civilization', and the book proceeds to 'discover the deeper roots of the crisis', asking whether 'Islam's mismatch with the modern world is intrinsic to the religion itself or is due to other factors'; whether Islamic civilization still represents a unity; whether it can be recreated anew; and if so, under what conditions.

Allawi defines Islamic civilization in terms of the centrality of the sacred and the community, in contrast to the secular individualism of modern western civilization. Departing from the claim that Islamic civilization is currently in the grip of 'a monumental crisis', partly caused by western encroachments which prevented Islam from having its own path to modernity, and partly from the decline of its inner vitality and creativity, the author proceeds to trace a series of failed attempts to restore this vitality. These endeavours started with traditional jihads in Algeria and elsewhere; attempts at reform aimed at transcending traditionalism and reconciling Islam with modernity; extensive and prolonged experimentations with various forms of secularization; and, finally the 'revolt of Islam' currently manifesting itself in the escalation of Islamic militancy.

Partly as a response to this militancy, and prodded on by western powers alarmed by 'Islamically inspired' terrorist violence, a number of movements have arisen that seek to bring about an 'Islamic Reformation'. The author dismisses the parallels with the Christian experience as 'absurd', and expresses astonishment at the adoption of programmes of 'Islamic Reformation' as the declared political objectives of major (non-Muslim) powers. He offers a negative evaluation of the impact and the prospects of the boldest of these Islamic reform bids, an assessment that is hard to contest. Allawi rightly debunks the mythical ascription of modernizing impact to the Reformation, and its depiction as a 'pre-history of the Enlightenment', reminding us that it has never received universal Christian endorsement, and has generated violence and religious extremism. However, the author at times slips into affirming the very parallels he has earlier debunked.

Concluding that neither thorough secularization nor militancy is likely to save or restore Islamic civilization, he argues that the solution lies in reclaiming Islam's inner spirituality. According to Allawi,
