

In the third article, "Traditional Routes and Highways of Steam," Aldo Carera describes the development of the land and waterway transportation systems, a highly important network leading from Milan to Switzerland. It is not surprising to learn that Como was the first main city in Lombardy to be connected by railway to Milan (on December 6, 1849). Carera provides a vast amount of information and statistics about road, railway, and navigation quality and conditions; length of routes; costs of construction and maintenance; ticket prices; numbers of passengers; amount of goods shipped; and many other aspects of a transportation network that was among the most developed in Italy. Steamboats traveled in Lake Como, railways were constructed, and in the 1880s the province was fourth among all Italian provinces in road length per square kilometer (p. 392). Yet neither steamboats nor the railway acquired a clear dominance over the old transportation methods. The traditional and the new continued to coexist in the 1880s.

The last essay, "The Lasting Gap Between Resources and Population," by Rosalba Canetta, focuses on social and demographic transformations of the Comascan province. Although agriculture remained the main source of livelihood, an increasing number of people supported themselves in the manufacturing, trade, and service sectors. This, however, did not necessarily improve their material conditions. The period between 1815 and 1880 was, in fact, one of Como's most difficult times (p. 643). Poverty in the country increased, urban workers lived in poor conditions, and insufficient nutrition caused the spread of diseases. A gap between the resources of the province and its rising population (between 1814 and 1881 the population in the Comascan province rose 67 percent) forced many to emigrate.

While the volume provides much useful information, it does not adequately analyze certain questions and topics. Missing is a rigorous examination of the changes in the Comascan area when it became part of united Italy, as well as of the ties between that region and other parts of Lombardy. Also absent is an article on trade and banking. Yet despite these shortcomings, this is a very useful work for anybody interested in the economy of modern Italy. It clearly supplements the more general works by Mario Romani and Kent Roberts Greenfield on the Lombard economy.

Les villes dans la France moderne: 1740-1840. By Bernard Lepetit. Paris: Editions Albin Michel, 1988. Pp. 490. F 198.

In the last few years urban history studies have veered strongly away from the study of specific cities to the analysis of urbanization and of urban networks, as a growing interest in both demography and geography has encouraged shifts in methods and interpretive frameworks. Where static structures once commanded attention, the interest in process and in interlinkages within a large area now dominates. Because of the methodological influence of the Annales school, even the older style of French urban historians embedded their city histories within regional studies. But more recently French demographers and social historians have shifted their focus to the national level and to systemic links among cities. Bernard Lepetit's work adds substantially to this revision of urban scholarship through his study of the functioning of the French urban hierarchy between 1740 and 1840.

Lepetit's book is bold in its scope as well as novel in its approach. He mixes sophisticated quantitative techniques with a detailed look at the categories and arguments of early modern French urban analysis. Taking seriously contemporary views of towns, he shows how depictions of cities had, by the mid-seventeenth century, acquired a strong sense of urban space and how, by the early eighteenth, the notions of circulation and movement dominated discussions of cities—themes that recurred among
