

Some people considered an alternative policy recommendation (perhaps justified) as follows:

1. More teachers are given sufficient professional autonomy to make it

As the number of teachers who have sufficient autonomy to make it has increased, the number of teachers who have not sufficient autonomy to make it has decreased. This is a good thing, because it means that the number of teachers who have sufficient autonomy to make it is now greater than the number of teachers who have not sufficient autonomy to make it. This is a good thing, because it means that the number of teachers who have sufficient autonomy to make it is now greater than the number of teachers who have not sufficient autonomy to make it.

Example: "The number of teachers who have sufficient autonomy to make it has increased, and the number of teachers who have not sufficient autonomy to make it has decreased. This is a good thing, because it means that the number of teachers who have sufficient autonomy to make it is now greater than the number of teachers who have not sufficient autonomy to make it."

2. Teachers should be given the right to make decisions about

Teachers should be given the right to make decisions about the curriculum, the way they teach, and the way they assess their students. This is a good thing, because it means that teachers will be able to make decisions about the curriculum, the way they teach, and the way they assess their students. This is a good thing, because it means that teachers will be able to make decisions about the curriculum, the way they teach, and the way they assess their students.
